

“It will be a sin to kill a mockingbird.”

“Mockingbirds do no harm to us, and they will sing for us.”

This was my original motivation to read this book. Wanted to know more about discrimination, wanted to see what kind of family could speak out such warmhearted words, wanted to treat people around me better...

SCENES I LIKE

GUILTY, POVERTY, APPRECIATION & THE GREAT SOUL

This is the first and the only time Atticus had tears throughout the book. Indeed, it's touching.

Even after all the clear evidence had been provided in front of the jury, they still gave Tom Robinson "Guilty". However, at that time, this had been considered as a significant step, even though it's a small step. Maybe all the black people never really had any hope in this case.

It started from the breakfast, when Jem found something special in the food, then they found the kitchen was filled with food sent by those black people in the early morning.

That was a time when the whole US was under economic depression, not to say the poverty of the blacks.

Could you imagine how does it feel when your kitchen was filled with food from these hard working people, and the reality they were facing came to your mind too?

SCENES I LIKE

DON'T KILL A MOCKINGBIRD AGAIN

The book never mentioned directly, but we will all understand who really killed Bob Ewell. This must be my favorite part, because of the interesting conversation between Atticus and the sheriff, what Atticus said to Boo at the end, what Atticus wanted his children to know and the moments you could recall how did Boo care about these kids.

Before this scene, Boo had never appeared in front of us, but we got to know him based on what happened to the kids. The gifts they found in the tree knot. The blankets that warmed them in a cold winter. Therefore you won't be surprised why Boo appeared there and rescued the kids.

When Atticus was talking to the sheriff, he guided the sheriff to believe it was Jem killed Bob Ewell, even though it's self defense, he had to go through legal process. Then the sheriff kept persuading him to let it go, and it should be himself to make the town believe that Bob Ewell killed himself while he was trying to kill the kids. What a smart lawyer. Life returned back to peace, no one blamed the kids, no one thought about Boo. But what would happen, if they are not white?
