

Today, I don't really want to do much work, although tonight still plan to do some of it. Again, passion is draining.

Every time, I worked so hard, finished everything before the sprint end, updated all the details with everyone, documented everything with easy to read structure, even scheduled 1+ hour meeting with them to go through all the details, answer all of their questions and finally all achieved the agreement.

However, this time, someone wants to take over the project in a very ugly way. They made an assumption against your solution, but while they started to do many out of scope work, they are not addressing the assumption they used against you. You have to fight, otherwise it's very bad for the team. The manager is useless, everyone knows that, and this situation has been utilized by that person. She's taking advantage of it.

I really don't want to finish everything that fast every time. That didn't make me feel happy. I just want a pleasant and peaceful life, go to work with a peaceful mood, then go home and never touch the work at home. Simple.

I'm not competing with anyone, why have to undertake these? Why?

All in all, still it's the manager's problem. But you really think there will be a better team lead? I, strongly doubt, strongly doubt.

Now I regret I hired her. Howcome, why this happened?

One thing really funny during today's discussion.

They said their opinion. Which has conflicting logic and I no longer wanted to pointed out, only spoke out the obvious ones. My opinion is still straightforward, do what the client really wants.

There should always be back and forth communication with the client, you cannot deliver something perfect at the very beginning. Deliver what they want first, if there will be any other question, keep improving. In this way both sides can understand what the requirement really is. Everything looks simple to me, homcome always became more and more complex when there are more people jumped in.

After we made the points, Anton said, in fact he doesn't disagree with anyone of us. He always be like this, disagree with the metrics clients like to see, but himself cannot provide a better solution. When I just started working with Anton, I simply could not tolerate this type of style, how could you disagree without a valid reason or a better solution? But gradually, now I simply feel that moment was too funny. We all kept quiet. Somewhat know why every time no one was really debating with Anton....

Not going to finish current ticket that fast. Slow down.
Even when you finished everything fast, later someone will still delay the whole progress. Why give them the results fast.
I'm going to work slower, and grab at least 1 more people to discuss together.
